

In the first edition of the Greater Cincinnati Pet Pages we discussed the techniques I find most useful when I am communicating with animals. Since then I have learned there are a lot of pet owners sending and receiving messages from /to their pets. Over the past few years I have had the good fortune to work with many of them and with other animal communicators in the Greater Cincinnati area and in other parts of the country.

One thing has become very clear to me. Not all communicators work the same way even though the results are amazingly similar. There is no single way to exchange information with animals. Whichever method works for you is the one you should use.. You may actually be getting bits and pieces of information in several different ways.

When I touch an animal I “see” little flashes of the animals thoughts in my mind. All thoughts come to me very quickly. These picture flashes are only seen for a few seconds. I try to interpret the thought pictures that I see from an animal into my words. I do not hear words from the animals. I only see things from the animals point of view. That may not be the owners point of view. For instance an animals might show me that a person poked them with something sharp. It hurt them. What the animal does not understand is that it was a Veterinarian giving them a necessary medical injection. The animal only understands it was an unpleasant experience.

My friend Gail, from Indiana sees pictures in vivid color. She is a very gifted communicator I am always amazed at the descriptions she is able to see while working with animals. She will talk about a green toy or a yellow blanket. I see things in black, white and shades of gray.

Katie, a young woman that I have worked with from Columbus, Ohio. talks about what the animal feels and thinks when she communicates. When she works with an animal she does not “see” pictures at all. Instead she tunes in on their emotions, feelings and thoughts.

Tiffany , a communicator from Texas has recently started working with animal other than her own. She feels physical pain so intensely that she will often leave a session in great personal discomfort. That is not unusual. I have also had it happen to me. After a person has a little more experience it becomes easier to recognize the pain the animal is experiencing, describe it to the animals owner and then let it go from your own (the communicators) body.

I have been told that the way a person thinks when pondering a matter has a lot to do with the kind of animal communication style that will be easiest for them. I tend to just stare into space - not focusing on anything at all when I am working.

When concentrating on a subject, if the person looks upward they tend to be a visual / see person. If a person looks straight ahead while thinking they tend to have a more verbal / auditory communication style. They will talk about what kind of sounds the animal hears around them. When a person ponders a matter and looks in a downward direction they tend to communicate about feelings / emotions.

My point is “there is no single way” to communicate with animals. Whatever method works for you is the one you should practice. Trust your intuition regardless of how you are receiving it. No two people work exactly alike. Try communicating with your animals. It is easy and fun. It is also a good experience for you and your pet. You just may learn some things your didn’t know before.
